Geotagging – Audioscript 1

Have you ever heard of the term geotagging? And if so, what does it mean?
Experts say that geotagging can be dangerous for the environment! Why so? I had to get more information to find out why!

There are some pretty beautiful and stunning places out there in the world, some were hidden gems, and most likely there are some that are still hidden, unknown to many and known only to the locals. The popularity of these places has grown throughout the years, from a few thousand of people that visit, to over a million. This increase in numbers of visitors wasn't because of marketing or advertisements. It is because when the photos are posted online, they influence the users of social media. Geotagging is about tagging places, attaching data location to a picture.

Taking a look at some interesting places in the US, these numbers have increased because there were people from all over the world that wanted to be part of what was going on out there. Social media was the main trigger. The area around the site of interest had to undergo some adjustments for visitors. New infrastructures, such as car parks and visitor centres, railings and trails were planned. This has a negative effect, as people destroy nature and pollute the environment. The landscape slowly changes, the protected areas suffer changes, visitors destroy wildlife.

People go wild over geotagging, and visitors want to get the perfect iconic photo near the edge of cliffs!
So, are people going to these remote stunning areas just to admire and experience their beauty, or do they go just so that they can post their photos on social media and get likes?
